SPOTLIGHT ON...

ACCESSING NUTRITIOUS FOOD

Grayson County Extension made more than 600 contacts with preschoolers during the 10-session "Learning, Eating, and Activity for Preschool (LEAP)" program. The Family and Consumer Sciences agent read books related to food themes and led children in activities related to the books, including taste-testing various foods. Participating preschool teachers, as well as the agent, noted that children progressively tasted more food and requested additional food as the sessions continued. In addition, the children reported that they asked their parents to buy at least one of the foods tasted during the program, and the teachers reported that parents began bringing more nutritious snacks for the class. A follow-up evaluation with the teachers showed that, overall, the children were eating better and were more willing to try new foods.¹
