Accessing Nutritious Food

The Master Food Volunteers and the Cooperative Extension Service have been promoting local foods at the Downtown Farmers Market. There are many benefits to buying local including better tasting food, reducing energy used for transport, and keeping local money in the community. The manager of the farmer's market stated that having cooperation with outside agencies makes it more favorable for the market to receive monies. Individual vendors stated that when the Master Food Volunteers were there promoting produce, they sold more and increased their profits by up to 20%. There was an increase in customers, and all the booths at the Downtown Farmers Market have been rented for next year.¹
